Abstract

While the notion of the ‘area’ or ‘Sprachbund’ has a long history in linguistics, with geographically-defined regions frequently cited as a useful means to explain typological distributions, the problem of delimiting areas has not been well addressed. Lists of general-purpose, largely independent ‘macro-areas’ (typically continent size) have been proposed as a step to rule out contact as an explanation for various large-scale linguistic phenomena. This squib points out some problems in some of the currently widely-used predetermined areas, those found in the World Atlas of Language Structures (Haspelmath et al., 2005). Instead, we propose a principled division of the world’s landmasses into six macro-areas that arguably have better geographical independence properties.

Keywords

areality – macro-areas – typology – linguistic area

1 Areas and Areality

The investigation of language according to area has a long tradition (dating to at least as early as Hervás y Panduro, 1971 [1799], who draws few historical conclusions, or Kopitar, 1829, who is more interested in historical inference), and is increasingly seen as just as relevant for understanding a language's history as the investigation of its line of descent, as revealed through the application of the comparative method.

The underlying idea is that human interaction (as well as descent) is a major factor in shaping the languages involved (Weinreich, 1953; Thomason and Kaufman, 1988). Since, however, data on human interaction in prehistory is scarce except for some regions and some periods, we cannot always trace interaction patterns to their linguistic outcome. Rather, the study of areas and linguistic features is bidirectional: sometimes the linguistic data is known, and the interaction is inferred; sometimes the interaction patterns are known or hypothesized, and their role in shaping the languages is inferred. Either inference is justified by (probabilistic) laws extractable from cases where both interaction and linguistic patterns are known, and the principle of uniformitarianism.

Most studies are devoted to the linguistic outcomes of a specific present contact situation. Essentially, the two options are to extract an area from the linguistic data empirically (Daumé and Campbell, 2007; Donohue and Whiting, 2011; Muysken et al., in press; and others), or to predetermine the bounds of a region by some non-linguistic criterion and then test for the significance of these regions against linguistic data (Bickel and Nichols, 2012; Muysken et al., in press; Lucas et al., 2011; Michael et al., 2014). Such cases do not usually require enumerating all effects of interaction, typically not the effects involving languages peripheral to the languages in scope. To phrase it differently, to describe one fragment of history is a contribution that does not necessarily require describing every fragment of history. However, equally important are studies that are devoted to ruling out language contact as an explanation for some linguistic data in favor of a genealogical and/or universal account (cf. Bakker, 2010). Doing so is typically a much heavier task, since it requires encompassing all effects of contact. The task would be made simpler if it were possible to divide the world into independent discrete micro-regions to be used as stratification.

Human interaction is enormously dynamic, involving a number of factors that seem intractable (but see Section 3). However, one strong limiting factor on human interaction is that, in pre-industrial times, adjacency was a prerequisite for any significant interaction. Further refinements could possibly be made with reference to mountains, rivers, deserts or other geographically bounded factors. Be that as it may, there is no hope of ever achieving an all-purpose list of independent discrete micro-regions this way, since most micro-regions would be adjacent to other micro-regions, and we have no means of rejecting the assumption of interaction between them. There are, however, some principled possibilities for macro-regions, given the continent shapes and the water bodies dividing them.

In Section 2 we discuss the principles and outcome areas of the widely-used World Atlas of Language Structures (Haspelmath et al., 2005, henceforth WALS). In Section 3, we offer a macro-areal division which is based purely on the principles of geographical independence, without reference to linguistic data. We argue that this division, though not dramatically different, has advantages over that found in the WALS.

2 WALS Areas and the Principles behind Them

Given the existence of continents with large bodies of water separating them, macro-regions offer some possibilities to achieve a general-purpose list of discrete and independent areas. Dryer (1989: 264) takes up this line and sets up five large continental areas: Africa, Eurasia, Australia-New Guinea, North America and South America. In Dryer (1992: 84–85), this list is revised to six areas: Africa, Eurasia (excluding southeast Asia), Southeast & Oceania, Australia-New Guinea, North America and South America; these areas are now widespread in typological work, including their adoption in the World Atlas of Language Structures (though see footnote 1). Dryer (1989: 83–85, 1992: 267–270) contains ample discussion of various difficulties involved in testing for areal (and genealogical) biases in linguistic feature distributions, and the macro-areal division clearly has the ambition to “control for large-scale areal phenomena” (Dryer, 1992: 84–85) which requires the “assumption ... that these areas are independent of each other” (Dryer, 1992: 84). At the same time, however, his macro-areal division also aims to have “areas ... roughly comparable in genetic and typological diversity” (Dryer, 1989: 268–269, 1992: 84). The WALS classification into macro-areas directly continues Dryer’s (1989, 1992) work. We shall decompose the two requirements for areal inclusion set up by Dryer:

- Areal-genealogical control (“control criterion”): that the areas can serve as (part of a scheme for) a control for areal and genealogical effects, and
- Comparable in genealogical and typological diversity (“balance criterion”): that the areas should be roughly comparable in genetic and typological diversity.

Examples of concrete choices of either kind in the context of WALS will be given in the reminder of this section. We then discuss the theoretical motivations thereof, and propose a different solution.

MAP 1 Regions predefined as 'macro-areas' in WALS. Key: from west to east, the regions are: Africa (black); Eurasia (white); Southeast Asia and Oceania (black); Australia and New Guinea (white); North America (black); South America (white)

In WALS the world is divided into six areas, as listed in (1).<sup>1</sup>

- (1) Africa;
- Australia-New Guinea;
- Eurasia;
- North America;
- Southeast Asia and Oceania;
- South America.

The basis for assigning a language into one area and not another is generally straightforward, especially in the center of each area. There are, however, numerous cases, predictably towards the borders between the areas, in which assignment to areas does not follow from the geography. Map 1 shows the distribution of these six areas, as found in the coding of languages included in WALS, mapped according to the coordinates declared there.

A first point of interest is the Bering Strait, which divides the macro-areas Eurasia and North America. The relevant portion of the WALS classification is shown in Map 2, with three languages of mainland Asia being classed as part of North America, not mimicking the water division.

<sup>1</sup> We note that this macro-areal classification is found only in the CD-ROM accompanying the 2005 WALS edition (available online: <http://www.eva.mpg.de/lingua/research/tool.php>, accessed June 1, 2012). It is not discussed in the 2005 book, and the WALS online (Dryer et al., 2011) offers no alternative areal classification(s).

MAP 2 Macro-areal affiliation across the Bering Strait in WALS

The assignment of the three mainland Asian languages to the North American macro-area is deliberate (Dryer, 1989: 268, 1992: 83). Whenever there are genealogically related (on the genus level) languages that span across macro-areas, all the member languages are assigned to exactly one of the areas. Here, the three languages concerned are Naukan, Siberian and Sirenik Yupik, part of the Eskimo-Aleut family and the Eskimo genus, which is for the most part found in North America.

Another example is the Middle East, where the genus Semitic stretches from Africa into Eurasia. The locations of the languages concerned are shown in Map 3.

In this case, the intrusion of languages from the Africa-assigned genus reaches further into the alien continent. There are Eurasian languages which are closer to the African continent than Africa-assigned ones, e.g., on Cyprus where Arabic (Kormakiti) is classed as African, while Greek (Cypriot) is Eurasian; or Neo-Mandaic classed as African versus various Iranian languages classed as Eurasian.

The very extreme of the genus assignment principle concerns languages very far from their congeners due to colonial expansion. They can be found at extraordinary distances from their macro-area, such as Afrikaans (located in South Africa) being part of the Eurasia macro-area.

Another case of non-trivial border-area assignment illustrates a different principle of the Dryer (1989: 269) division. Map 4 shows the extent to which 'Southeast Asia and Oceania' is found far from the usual geographic use of the term. Here, all Tibeto-Burman languages have been assigned away from Eurasia, including Mandarin Chinese in the north of China and Bodish languages as far west as Balti in Pakistan (as well as numerous languages of India, and all languages of Nepal except (Indo-Aryan) Nepali and the isolate Kusunda). This appears to have been done in order to increase the genealogical and/or typological diversity of the Southeast Asia area, and not because the languages in question form one genus. The Sino-Tibetan languages belong to many different genera and have some important typological differences to the other Southeast Asian families. Therefore their assignment to Southeast Asia increases the genealogical and typological diversity of that region (and more so than their assignment to Eurasian would have achieved).

MAP 3 African 'leakage' into Eurasia

In the New World, the Darién gap is the widely accepted geographic boundary between South America and the rest of the Americas. The WALS languages in that region are shown in Map 5.

As in the previous examples, genera found on both sides of the gap are assigned to one area each. But there is also an inconsistency with previous examples here: Miskito Coast English Creole is part of ‘South America,’ yet the languages genealogically related to Miskito Coast Creole English are found in the Eurasian and African macro-areas.

The macro-area ‘Southeast Asia and Oceania’ extends from the mainland of (south-east) Asia into the eastern Pacific, but excludes those languages in the ‘Australia and New Guinea’ macro-area, in the center of the ‘Southeast Asia and Oceania’ range. The point at which these two macro-areas interact is shown in Map 6.

Here we find another likely inconsistency in the macro-area assignments. The genus Oceanic, making up the eastern half of the white dots on Map 6, is clearly adjacent to the languages of the ‘Australia and New Guinea’ area rather than the Southeast Asia area. The assignment of the Oceanic genus to ‘Australia and New Guinea’ would also have increased the typological diversity of that region.

We have seen that, while the ‘macro-areas’ listed in WALS follow approximately continental norms, there are many cases in which the ‘macro-area’ groupings are simply another way to represent families. This would seem to be counterproductive to achieving statistical independence between macro-areas, yet at the same time they are explicit rules in the schema underlying WALS. We will therefore take a closer look, recalling the two desiderata from the beginning of this section.

MAP 6 New Guinea and Austronesian

Regarding areal-genealogical control (the “control criterion”), the classic scheme for testing whether some discrete property a language can have (henceforth “single-language property”) is overrepresented after controlling for genealogical and areal factors, is to divide languages of the world into genealogical cells (genera, families, etc.) and geographical cells (areas or macro-areas of some sort; cf. Bakker, 2010, and references cited therein). To the extent that the cells are independent, classical techniques from probability theory can be validly applied (Cochran, 1963). This is indeed also Dryer’s (1989, 1992) tactic, but, as we have seen, it is applied with various imperfections. The cross-area assignments allow for the possibility that languages from different genera and macro-areas are not guaranteed to be independent—even if the genealogical and geographical cells are assumed to be independent. (If the unit of sampling is genera rather than languages from genera, the same holds; i.e., selecting genera from different macro-areas does not guarantee that those genera are areally independent.) With a strict geographical division and a strict genealogical division, selecting languages from different areas and genealogies (be it families, genera or some other division) does preserve independence.

Regarding the desideratum of comparability in genealogical and typological diversity (the “balance criterion”), a stipulation that the geographical cells should be of roughly equal size can not be motivated from sampling theory, if the matter of interest is a single-language property. It may be motivated if the matter of interest is some property (henceforth “language-set property”) a set of languages can have (rather than a single language), or a—possibly continuous—value which requires more than one language to estimate. To make this difference clearer, consider the following example. Suppose we have a series of identical coins and we want to find out whether this type of coin is biased. If we can flip the coins independently, it is straightforward to estimate the bias of the type coin by combining the evidence from each coin flip. If, however, someone sprayed glue between various subsets of the coins, flipping one coin may flip other coins connected by glue. We may then wish to divide the series of coins into cells that are connected by glue, such that no two different cells are connected by glue. If we then combine the evidence from flips of coins from different cells (rather than every coin), we will be able to use classical techniques from probability theory to estimate the bias of the type of coin itself, eliminating any effects of the glue distribution. This is the situation parallel to testing for a biased distribution of some single-language property. Coins correspond to languages, glue to areal or genealogical influence, and the single-language property is heads/tails in the case of coins, but may be, e.g., Noun-Numeral order in the case of languages. We reiterate that for this case, it makes no difference if the cells unconnected by glue are different or equal in size. Two independent coins (two cells, one member each) is equivalent evidence to one independent coin and one thousand coins connected by glue (two cells, one member and thousand-member) when applying classical techniques in probability theory (Cochran, 1963). Suppose now that, rather than a discrete property of a coin, we are interested in, e.g., the interaction of glue and coins—perhaps the glue sticks less to the head side of the coin than the tail side, or perhaps there are different kinds of glue—then there may be a reason to divide the coins into cells so that every cell contains coins with glue on both the head side of some coin and the tail side of some coin. It may even be motivated to have cells that are not completely glue-separated, if this allows for more cells of the required size and distribution.

Since the two desiderata ‘control criterion’ and ‘balance criterion’ can be opposing, it is not possible to devise a general strategy that optimizes both aims simultaneously. It would be possible if there was a weighting of the two aims, but the appropriate weight clearly depends on the exact feature in question. For this reason it may be an ill-founded idea to devise an all-purpose list of areas to be used for language-set properties. For single-language properties, however, the ‘balance criterion’ is irrelevant and thus a geographically optimal all-purpose area division is feasible. We pursue this in the next section. (It contains only a minimal requirement on the number of languages in a cell, and thus the amount of potentially underused independent data points discarded is very small.) We then compare the resulting areal division, and it turns out that, empirically, this area division is at least as good in terms of the ‘balance criterion' as that in WALS, whose division has some of the 'control criterion' compromised. We thus argue that the macro-areal division in this paper is preferable to the one in WALS—even using Dryer's (1989, 1992) desiderata, and regardless of whether the 'control criterion' or the 'balance criterion' is more important.

3 Principles for Macro-areal Division

If geographic regions are intended to model socially significant 'interaction zones,' then water poses a particular problem—one that emphasizes social factors over Euclidean ones when determining areas and macro-areas. For instance, Malagasy, spoken on the island of Madagascar, south-east of the African mainland, is classified in WALS as part of the Southeast Asia and Oceania macro-area, despite being clearly closer to Africa. Can this be justified? One argument in favor of this grouping is that, historically, the language of Madagascar is descended from (Austronesian) languages of Southeast Asia, and that trade and interaction are recorded involving long-term contact with Southeast Asia. On the other hand, the island is part of the African region, and Malagasy contains loanwords that have Bantu, not Austronesian, sources. Furthermore, the Malagasy population has as strong an African biological source as a Southeast Asian one (e.g., Hurles et al., 2005), implying very strong social contact with the African mainland, and a very strong case for Madagascar to be considered at least as African as it is Southeast Asian. In the present paper, we only assume that, ceteris paribus, the larger the body of water the more difficult the social interaction across it. We do not assume that interaction is impossible across any body of water.

Many other possible classifications could be suggested. One other objectively verifiable one is that obtained by classing the world into areas based on social features (Burton et al., 1996); this does not address actual interaction, but at least takes account of social similarity, which might reflect social contact (Map 7).

A truly socio-geographic classification of the world into (macro-)areas seems, for the moment, to be an intractable problem. A more modest, and importantly attainable goal is to devise macro-areas on geographical grounds. On purely geographical grounds, we suggest the following list of macro-areas, with locations shown in Map 8 (Donohue et al., 2013):

MAP 7 Social 'macro-areas'

MAP 8 Suggested revised 'macro-areas' as listed in (2)

- (2) Africa;
Australia;
Eurasia;
Multinesia;<sup>2</sup>

2 We suggest the novel name 'Multinesia' for the region which encompasses Indo-Malaysia, Melanesia, Micronesia and Polynesia. We do not use the existing label 'Pacific' as this label sometimes includes Australia.

North America;
South America.

These areas have the virtue of being maximally defined by physical geography, and being completely independent of linguistic affiliations. The suggested classification also avoids any subjectivity required to decide what is a genus or not, as is necessary for consistency with the cross-areal genera found in WALS. In the remainder of this section we offer a mathematical proof for the fitness of the classification we have advanced with Map 8.

We propose the following theoretical underpinning for dividing the world into linguistic areas on geophysical grounds. From a purely landmass versus water perspective, a division into areas might take the following form.

First, we define the terms partition and distance metric:

Partition: A partition  $c = [c_1, \dots, c_n]$  is a division of the world's landmass into cells.

A partition must exhaust the world's landmass (place any landmass in some cell), all cells must be non-empty and no two cells may overlap.

Distance Metric: A distance metric  $\delta$  is a function that provides a distance (in km) for any two pieces of landmass.

For example, one partition may be  $c_1$  as the landmass defined by the official borders of Sweden,  $c_2$  comprising Madagascar and Greenland,  $c_3$  mainland South America (cut off at the Panama Canal and leaving out any adjacent islands), and  $c_4$  the rest of the world's landmass. A possible  $\delta$  is simply the shortest distance (in km) between the coasts of two landmasses (henceforth coast-distance). Another possible  $\delta$  is the distance (in km) between the centerpoints of two landmasses (henceforth center-distance).

We may characterize any partition by its internal coherence and its disjointness:

Internal Coherence: The internal coherence of a cell  $ICC(c_i)$  is defined as the shortest distance required to connect all members of the cell. The internal coherence of an entire partition is defined as the sum internal coherence of all its cells:

$$ICP(c) = \sum_i ICC(c_i)$$

Disjointness: The disjointness of a partition is the the length (in km) of the border found between adjacent landmasses in different cells. If  $ADJ(c_i, c_j)$  is the number of kilometers of adjacent landmass between landmasses in  $c_i$  and  $c_j$ , the disjointness of the entire partition is:

$$DP(c) = \sum_{i \neq j} ADJ(c_i, c_j)$$

For example, the Internal Coherence of a cell consisting of mainland South America is 0 since it is one coherent landmass. The Internal Coherence of a cell consisting of Madagascar and Greenland, on the other hand, is much worse, since Madagascar and Greenland are many kilometers apart. The disjointness of a cell of Madagascar and Greenland is, however, 0 since both are islands and thus have no land adjacent to any other landmass. The disjointness of mainland South America is the length of the Panama Canal<sup>3</sup> since the corresponding strip of South American mainland is adjacent to the North American landmass along that line. Naturally, an optimal partition of the world's landmass is one that minimizes  $ICP(c) + DP(c)$ .

Next, we add languages to the problem. By definition, all languages are spoken by humans, and all humans live on land (even if some groups are known to spend a significant amount of time on the sea (Sopher, 1965), they still have a home base on land). The task of dividing the world into (linguistic) macro-areas is then reduced to dividing the human-inhabited landmass into areas. A further constraint is that we are interested only in partitions where all cells have at least a certain size. For linguistic areas, this size constraint may be naturally expressed in terms of number of languages, i.e., the areas in each cells have to be home to at least  $k$  languages.

The problem of finding the optimal geophysical division into linguistic macro-areas is thus: Given a number  $n$  of areas, and a minimum number of languages  $k$ , what is the partition  $c = [c_1, \dots, c_n]$  of the inhabited landmass that minimizes  $ICP(c) + DP(c)$ ?

Since the problem is of combinatorial nature, there is no guarantee that the solution can be computed quickly. However, in WALS  $n=6$ ; and if we set only a small size restriction, e.g.,  $k=250$ , it is possible to find the optimal partition. It is derived through a series of steps as outlined below.<sup>4</sup> Figure 1 shows a simplified schema of the same inference.

1. There are a total of 204 coherent landmasses large enough to appear with the resolution used in our experiments (see footnote 4).

3 This example assumes that the Panama Canal has not been dug yet or that it is too thin to count.

4 All computations were done using the elevation/water data points from the Shuttle Radar Topography Mission (SRTM), <http://dds.cr.usgs.gov/srtm/> (accessed March 16, 2011), at a resolution of 0.5 degrees. Maps 9–10 reflect this resolution. The location of languages is from a database of center-coordinates derived from the Ethnologue (Lewis, 2009) with extinct languages and other amendments added by the first author.

2. 95 of those are inhabited with at least one language. A selection of these 95 landmasses is shown in Table 1.
3. There are 4 landmasses that are in themselves large enough ( $k=250$  languages or more) to be a cell of their own. The requirement is that, in the end, 6 cells need to have at least  $k=250$  each. In the optimal solution, should those two further cells consist of splits of the big-4 in combination with other landmasses, or solely of combinations of the other landmasses? It is always suboptimal to break coherent landmasses, unless this is needed to meet the requirement that other cells should be large enough.<sup>5</sup>
4. We may check all the combinations of the non-big-4 landmasses versus all the possible ways to split the big-4 anywhere that yields two large enough areas. As is also intuitively obvious, the two least expensive of the big-4 cuts that yield large enough areas on both sides are the Panama Canal (82 km) and Suez Canal (164 km). As for combinations of the non-big-4 landmasses, brute-force computations show that the least expensive way to get at least 5 This is also true if there are fewer coherent landmasses than cells required; this is clearly not the case here.

$k=250$  languages is to connect Borneo to the Philippine islands via the small inhabited islands intervening—that is, to connect<sup>6</sup> Borneo to Bonggi island (167 km), Bonggi to Palawan (156 km), and Palawan to Luzon (273 km), totaling 597 km. In any other constellation where those islands do not form a cell of their own, the cheapest way to connect them anywhere totals 421 km. So to cut Eurasia-Africa at the Suez canal and attaching Borneo-Philippines to their closest neighbors will incur a cost of  $164 + 421 = 585$  km in disjointness and internal coherence. The solution with an independent cell with Borneo-Philippines at its core will incur a slightly higher cost:  $0 + 597 = 597$  km. (How to allocate the remaining landmasses is completely parallel for these two possibilities, so the calculation presented is the crucial one.) The Borneo-Philippines cell was the least expensive way to achieve a large enough cell, so the division at the Suez and Panama Canals is better than any partition that makes six large enough cells without dividing at Suez and Panama.

5. After the division at Suez and Panama, there are six landmasses which are large enough. Any further split is suboptimal, because that would only incur an adjacency cost, without a gain anywhere else in the constraint or optimality formula. All that remains is to optimally allocate the remaining 91 landmasses; in other words, to partition each one into the six landmasses such that the total ICP is minimized. This is a computationally tractable problem known as the minimal spanning tree (MST) problem for undirected graphs. In our case, the nodes are the landmasses and edges the distances between them. We used Kruskal's algorithm (Kruskal, 1956) with a small modification for solving the MST problem at hand. This modification is that any solution which connects the six cells is disallowed and that the algorithm stops when there are six connected components (rather than one).

6 The example uses coast-distances. The results for center-distances are parallel.

The resulting optimal divisions into macro-areas where  $n=6$  and  $k=250$  are shown in Maps 9 and 10.

As the maps show, using coast-distances vs. center-distances yields different partitions. In the case of coast-distances, Greenland-Iceland belongs to North America, and Eurasia stretches all the way to the Weber line, close to the western shores of New Guinea.<sup>7</sup> In the case of center-distances, the New Guinea area takes over the entire archipelago of Southeast Asia, including Taiwan, 7 The Weber line is a significant biogeographical boundary line with respect to mammalian fauna (Simpson, 1977), lying east of the Wallace line and west of the Lydekker line.

MAPS 9–10 The optimal division into macro-areas where  $n=6$  and  $k=250$ , using coast-distances (top) and center-distances (bottom). The maps are shown in Mercator projection but all distances used in the computations are the actual distances, i.e., with earth as a sphere.

and Greenland-Iceland is drawn into Eurasia. Which one of the two distances is relevant? This depends on the exact nature of the areal phenomenon in question. The pivotal point of an area is the center of gravity. If the areal phenomenon is very diffusable, the physical obstacles, i.e., large bodies of water, matter more than distance from the center. On the other hand, if the phenomenon is not very diffusable, the distance to the center is more relevant than the physical obstacles.

The differences in the outcome areas (be it center- or coast-distance-induced) compared to WALS are not dramatic regarding Africa, North America and South America. There is, however, a significant difference regarding Eurasia and where WALS has separated Southeast Asia from this landmass (yielding a very long adjacent border), as well as the position of Australia. This amounts to something like 2 differences out of 6 possible ones. If one uses the approach to statistical testing of typological universals found in Dryer (1992), where a trend is deemed significant if present in at least 5 of 6 (macro-)areas, then even the flip of one area can push a trend out of conventional levels of significance (Cysouw, 2005).

Finally, recall that one of the desiderata in Dryer (1989, 1992) was that the macro-areas should contain roughly similar amounts of genealogical and typological diversity. A comparison of the number of language families according to Glottolog 2.2 (Nordhoff et al., 2013)<sup>8</sup> for the WALS areas (Map 1) and the areas of Map 9 in the present paper is given in Table 2. As can be seen, the genealogical diversity is more balanced in the Map 9 classification, even though this was not one of its design criteria. The most diverse area in Map 9 is less diverse than that in the WALS classification, and the least diverse area in Map 9 is much more diverse than the least diverse WALS area.

As for typological diversity, we cannot perform a quantative comparison for lack of systematic typological data;<sup>9</sup> an informal comparison, however, suggests that the differences are not dramatic. For example, neither the typological diversity of our ‘Australia’ nor that of WALS’s ‘SE Asia & Oceania’ is large, and the remainder seems to balance out.

8 We use this classification since it is the only one to both (i) (briefly but) systematically disclose all justifications for the family divisions given, and (ii) classify all known languages in the world.

9 In particular, the data in the WALS itself is not sufficient (Hammarström, 2009).

4 Conclusions

We have shown that it is possible to come up with a list of objectively pre-defined areas that can be used as normative controls in cross-linguistic work. These areas are blind to language affiliation, and can be justified on a continental basis. The areas so defined are not of even size, but are all sizeable enough to allow for meaningful comparison. The number of macro-areas used in this paper was set to six, following assumptions in previous work. Although this is beyond the scope of the present paper, the scheme used for dividing the world into areas described here may, in principle, be applied with any other number as well.

A list of the languages found in WALS, with their areal affiliations as classified in this paper, can be found in the online Appendix at <http://dx.doi.org/10.1163/22105832-00401001>; booksandjournals.brillonline.com/content/22105832 (click on tab Supplements).

Some Principles of the Use of Macro-Areas
Language Dynamics & Change

Harald Hammarström & Mark Donohue

The following document lists the languages of the world and their assignment to the macro-areas described in the main body of the paper as well as the WALS macro-area for languages featured in the WALS 2005 edition. 7160 languages are included, which represent all languages for which we had coordinates available<sup>1</sup>. Every language is given with its ISO-639-3 code (if it has one) for proper identification. The mapping between WALS languages and ISO-codes was done by using the mapping downloadable from the 2011 online WALS edition<sup>2</sup> (because a number of errors in the mapping were corrected for the 2011 edition). 38 WALS languages are not given an ISO-code in the 2011 mapping, 36 of these have been assigned their appropriate iso-code based on the sources the WALS lists for the respective language. This was not possible for Tasmanian (WALS-code: tsm) because the WALS mixes data from very different Tasmanian languages and for Kualan (WALS-code: kua) because no source is given. 17 WALS-languages were assigned ISO-codes which have subsequently been retired – these have been assigned their appropriate updated ISO-code. In many cases, a WALS-language is mapped to several ISO-codes. As this has no bearing for the assignment to macro-areas, multiple mappings have been retained.

The Table contains the following information:

Language

ISO-639-3 code

WALS name/code The name/code used in the WALS 2005 edition

WALS MA The macro-area of the WALS 2005 edition:

Macro-Area	# ISO lgs	Macro-Area	# ISO lgs
Eurasia	307	South America	248
Africa	567	Other	65
Australia-New Guinea	377	SE Asia &amp; Oceania	504
North America	346

mid-coast MA The macro-area assignment computed using the average of centre and coast distances (shown in Figure 1).

Macro-Area	# ISO lgs	Macro-Area	# ISO lgs
Eurasia	1579	Africa	2148
Multinesia	1823	North America	651
Australia	324	South America	635

mid MA The macro-area assignment computed using centre distances (shown in Figure 3).
